

Weekly 10

This week's reading was different and unique in style in that we were required to explore an entire website in order to fully understand the concepts behind the idea of Xenofeminism. This theory illustrates how modern world science and technology can both be used in reconstructing the social structure of gender. In a world that arguably undergoes a process of globalization and digitalization on a daily bases, the Xenofeminist theory makes perfect sense and is highly relative. However, I do not believe the theory can be applicable in our modern world due to the lack of willingness modern citizens have in distorting the stable lives they currently enjoy. Letting "100 sexes bloom" in simple terms means refusing to view gender as a traditional binary concept but rather having the freedom to view gender as an open ended concept where we would live in a society of 100 sexes in a Xenofeminist world. Frankly, because I am so culturally used to the binary idea of males and females, the concept definitely felt foreign to me. I do not agree or disagree with the idea of 100 sex bloom as we live in a world that changes every day. As long as I can live in a world where elements of humility and compassion are present, I will be content.
